operations, often specializing in missions that took advantage of subterfuge, improvisation, the best in recon and surveillance tech to combat the changing global battlefield. MacGyvering everyday objects into working spyware was routine, and fellow SEALs referred to his activities simply as “special shit.” His parameters were: find, fix, and finish—and of course, leave no trace. The Right Kind of Crazy is unlike any military memoir you’ve ever read because Emerson is upfront about the fact that what makes you a great soldier and sometimes hero doesn’t always make you the best guy—but it does make for damn good stories. The mindset behind it states that the one that is most fit to survive is the one that is going to make it through the peril. While this may be true in theory, there is a major flaw in the idea... it leaves too much up to chance. You see, survival isn't something that is chance, it is something that is entirely based on skill, knowledge, and your ability to handle difficult situations. So, if the person who knows these things is the person in the wilderness, then they truly are the "most fit" and are going to greatly increase their own chances of survival. Do you
