The purpose of this study was to determine whether there was an association between preparation strategies of CPA exam candidates in the State of Minnesota and their exam results. This study investigated the correlations and relationships between successful candidate exam results with five areas of preparation. These areas were defined as inspiration for becoming a CPA, study methods and tools, work experience when the exam was started, the timing of completing the 150 credit-hour requirement, and the level of education to complete the 150 credit-hours. Spearman's rho correlation, Pearson and Chi-Square were used to examine the results from a survey questionnaire conducted in this study. The conclusions validated and supported the flexibility in preparation strategies and the educational requirement guidelines from the America Institute of Certified Public Accountants (AICPA, n.d.). The results indicated a moderately low relationship between most all of the preparation strategies under evaluation. The statistical assessment of the data do show a moderately positive relationship between exam results and the following preparation strategies: studying full-time while not working, using multiple types of study tools, and a higher level of education (i.e., graduate or undergraduate with multiple majors and minors) at the time when the exam was started.
