Out of the Flames details One family's direct experience of the Northern Ireland Troubles. On the 7th December 1971, Philip Coogan's life changes overnight when a sectarian bomb destroys his thriving garage business in the seaside town of Donaghadee. Determined to rebuild, Philip is frustrated at every turn by the cold shoulders of the planning authorities and those who vow they will see him 'run out of town'. Despite some help from an unexpected quarter - the Reverent Ian Paisley - there seems to be no way forward in an increasingly suspicious and hostile community. As the Troubles intensify, repeated attempts were made on Philip's life, and he and his young family fled across the border to the Republic, renting a damp and dilapidated cottage in Roscommon. Struggling to make ends meet, while reliving the horror of past events, Philip's health deteriorates as he suffers severe post-traumatic shock disorder and other related illnesses. Desperate for a better life for their children, Philip, and his wife plan to emigrate, but with no income, nor compensation for his injuries, it proves impossible. The final straw comes with a risible offer of £120 for the large size of his former business from the local government in the North. Feeling defrauded and conspired against. Philip becomes increasingly angry and paranoid and finally is admitted to a psychiatric hospital. Drugged and violently humiliated, he emerges a broken man. It seems that Philip's life, in any meaningful sense is over. What can save him? Out of The Flames charts, with lyricism and moving honesty, the remarkable triumph over the tragedy of one ordinary, living through extraordinary times.
